I'm a sophomore at Stanford University, and I'm majoring in computer science. I'm also a venture capitalist.

I know, it's a bit of an unconventional combination. But I've always been fascinated by the world of investing, and I'm convinced that venture capital is the best way to make a real impact on the world.

That's why I started my own venture capital fund last year. I called it "The Undergraduate Venture Fund."

My goal is to invest in early-stage startups that are working on solving some of the world's biggest problems. I'm particularly interested in startups that are using technology to make a difference in the areas of healthcare, education, and the environment.

So far, I've invested in a few really exciting companies. One of my favorite investments is a company called "Lumi." Lumi is developing a new type of solar panel that is much more efficient than traditional solar panels. I believe that Lumi has the potential to revolutionize the solar industry.

Another one of my investments is a company called "Heal." Heal is developing a new way to deliver healthcare. Heal allows patients to see a doctor from the comfort of their own home, via video chat. I believe that Heal has the potential to make healthcare more accessible and affordable for everyone.

I'm really excited about the potential of my investments. I believe that these companies have the potential to change the world. And I'm proud to be a part of their journey.

If you're interested in learning more about my venture capital fund, or if you have a startup that you think I should invest in, please feel free to contact me.
